

National Severe Weather Warning Service

Chief Forecasters Assessment

A cold, showery westerly airstream will stay in place across northern Britain, with a continued threat of travel disruption and difficult driving conditions due to both snow and ice. Whilst winds remain strong, with gales and local severe gales in places at first, they will continue to decrease slowly.

The Met Office have issued a Yellow Warning of Snow and Ice

Valid from 10:00 on Thu, 11th Dec 2014 until 11:00 on Fri, 12th Dec 2014

Frequent showers will continue to fall as sleet and snow, especially on higher ground but occasionally down to lower levels too. Further accumulations of 2-5 cm can be expected on ground above 150m, with perhaps 10 cm or more on ground above 300-400m - these larger accumulations will be mainly across the West Highlands, where some drifting is also likely. Some localised accumulations are also possible at lower levels, especially tonight. As the strong winds continue to ease overnight, wintry showers will become more isolated but icy stretches will develop more widely.

The public should be aware of continued difficult driving conditions and the possibility of travel disruption.
