

National Severe Weather Warning Service

Chief Forecasters Assessment

A cold front will move east and south across the United Kingdom through Tuesday night and Wednesday morning. This will introduce significantly colder air with frequent showers these turning readily to sleet and snow even at low levels. 2 to 5 cm is expected in many areas by dawn Wednesday with up to 10 cm in places. These higher accumulations are more likely over higher ground above 100 m but may also occur to low levels where showers are heavy and prolonged. Clear spells between showers will also lead to icy stretches forming on untreated surfaces.

The Met Office have issued a Yellow Warning of Snow and Ice

Valid from 21:00 on Tue, 01st Mar 2016 until 10:00 on Wed, 02nd Mar 2016

Showers will turn wintry this evening across the warning area, with the risk of a more prolonged spell of snowfall late in the night and early Wednesday morning, especially in the south. This will give a covering of snow with 2-5 cm possible in many places and locally 5-10 cm, these higher accumulations mainly above 100 m. Icy stretches on untreated roads and pavements are also likely to form.

Please be aware of some difficult driving conditions and the potential for travel disruption into the Wednesday morning rush hour.
